

LOCAL NEWS.

Marshal Kaulukou was at the fire last night.

"The Sanctuary" is the subject at the Seventh Day Adventist meeting, Gymnasium building, to-night.

The Australia sailed for San Francisco about midnight. She loaded a large quantity of bananas here.

A coal passer was turned off the steamship Australia just before she sailed last night. He had to seek shelter at the Police Station, being without money. His story is that the engineer was harsh with him because a sore leg unfitted him for work, and that he talked back to the engineer, for which the latter put him off here.

Carpenters were busy on Saturday making the long low tables for the native feast in the lanai at the Palace. The arms of all nations will be fixed on the posts, of which there are twenty on each side, and two at each end. Besides broad openings in the ends there are to be four entrances on each side. Over the tables, extending from end to end, is a striped canopy of red, white and blue. Another ornament will be a large crown.

Mr. A. C. Thorne, member of the firm of the Australian American Agency Co.; Mr. John Baker, of Auckland, mail agent; and Mr. Philip N. Young, of San Francisco, passengers on the Australia, came ashore while the ship was in port and were driven round town. They expressed themselves as very much pleased with Honolulu, and would have liked to make a longer stay. They met several old acquaintances among our business men here.

The Postal Savings Bank.

It may not be generally known that the Postal Savings Bank remains open on Saturday afternoons till six o'clock, for the accommodation of the working-men who may wish to deposit their surplus earnings. Yet Saturday is not the busiest day at the institution, Monday generally bringing the largest number of depositors of all the days in the week. The average on Saturday is from 12 to 15, while on Monday it is about 20. Many depositors come once in two or three weeks, so that the average of deposits ranges pretty high.

Police Court.

The seventeen Chinese arrested for gaming about a week previously, were on Saturday given another remand, this time till December 1st.

Antone Perada, for assault and battery, was fined $11 including costs.

Kuhia, assault and battery on a woman, $13.30.

Keoni Hiu and Kamikana, preventing justice, $18 each and three days.

Paika, Pipipi and Makauli, deserting contract service, settled out of Court.

Kicked by a Ho. o.

A little boy named Stayner, three or four years of age, whose father works at Mr. Morgan's on King street, was kicked in the forehead by Hon. John A. Cummins' horse on the Palace grounds Saturday. The child was standing in charge of his sister at the front of the crowd, when the horse kicked up on being spurred and hit him over the left eye. Dr. Trousdale being near was called by Capt. Tell and found that the wound, though bleeding freely, did not reach the bone.

THE HISTORICAL PROCESSION.

Fine Weather and Happy Hawaiians.

"The storm had ceased:
The music still air
Was music slumbering
On her instrument."

The rain held up on Saturday forenoon, and an hour before the time announced for the procession to start for the Palace the streets were lined with crowds of whites and natives of all colors, all sizes, all eyes, all sexes, all nations and all degrees; for Honolulu is for its size the most cosmopolitan city on the face of the earth. They were all jostling and crowding their neighbors in the most good-natured humor and familiar fashion imaginable, each desirous of getting the best view possible of the historical procession, the like of which had never before been seen in the Islands.

At last, after the usual delay consequent on all processions, the stirring strains of martial music proclaimed its approach, and on it came, marshalled by Hon. John A. Cummins, preceded by a detachment of police under command of the Marshal, and headed by the Royal Hawaiian Band in their black and red uniforms.

Next came the boys of the Royal school to the number of 260, in their neat white and red uniforms, marching in companies. Some of the very little fellows presented a most comical appearance but all marching along with military precision.

Then came a mixed company of native warriors, old and young, dressed in brown sail cloth, with banana leaves, bound with ribbon grass, around their heads, and carrying spears.

Following them came twelve floats, containing canoes, double canoes, catamarans and boats. The first had double canoes, representing ancient Maui. On the second, third and fourth floats were large double canoes filled with chiefs and fishermen, the former with mantles of yellow cloth and high red helmets, the latter dressed in brown tights with yellow cloth breech clouts, both classes purporting to represent the condition of the inhabitants when the white discoverers landed on these Islands. The fishermen were handling their paddles, fishing lines and nets in a realistic and energetic way, especially those casting lines for the bonito. An attendant would catch handfuls of leaves and moss representing bait, from the large bait boxes at the side of the canoes, the one with the line taking it in his mouth, as is still the custom with the native fishermen, they chewing the bait before placing it on the hooks.

In the fourth canoe were men representing two chiefs of Kauai, the principal one being Kalaniana'olaha.

The fifth and sixth were catamarans on wheels, in the first of which sat two ancient mariners—supposed a former great chief named Pakaa and his son Kua Pakaa. They were covered with curious looking mantles of ti leaves, and might have chanted with gusto the lines from the lay of the "Ancient Mariner."

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free,
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

In the next of this pair were two fishermen with a peculiarly shaped net used in fishing for uhu.

The seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh floats each bore canoes about 30 feet long, artistically draped with long festoons of sea moss. They were all filled with chiefs, warriors and fishermen. On the tenth was a figure of a large shark with a placard bearing the word, "Kaikai." Native girls representing mermaids occupied position on either side of the canoes.

By the sides of the bow of the canoe following that were two robust-looking native girls, holding tridents, and with long flowing white hair and heavy wreaths of sea moss, twined picturesquely round their dark brows. All the girls had leis, some of sea moss and others of flowers and myrtle leaves, encircling their necks. The paddlers were very energetic in their motions with their broad-bladed paddles, showing how dextrous they would be on the water. The chiefs in flowing robes, as before described, sat stoically upright in their positions in the canoes, now and then rising to direct their course or stimulate the rowers to greater exertion as if some rival canoes were to be overcome.

The two last canoes were occupied by the King's Fishermen, twelve in each canoe, with three chiefs in gold-colored mantles. The next float was that of the hula dancers. There were four of them, stout native girls, dressed in white waists with light yellow skirts reaching to the knees. They had peculiar looking anklets of corn silk, leis of sea moss, twining sashes of ilima flowers, and Hawaiian myrtle leaves. Behind them, squatted on native mats in Hawaiian fashion, were two of the "hula" teachers, and again in the rear of these were stationed native musicians, sounding a mysterious chant, and energetically beating their music on calabash drums, accompanied by weird singing of moles and native songs that used to be sung for great chiefs in former times. The gestures of the hula dancers appeared much more poetical and rhythmic than many who have only heard of them suppose. Still it must have been something akin to hula dancing which Caesar had in view when he said: "No man dances when sober, unless perchance he be a madman. Dancing is the last accompaniment of revelry and vice." Although a sort of curiosity now, the hula is a relic of barbarism, an accessory of the immoral usages of Hawaiian paganism. The only banner in the procession was on this car and bore the inscription: "Hula K Healan: Ka Moi Nov. 16."

The next float, a large dray drawn by four horses, contained one of the King's barges, in which was the Reformatory school band in marine uniforms.

Then came the King's senior and junior rowing crews in their racing gigs. The seniors were dressed in white and blue yachting shirts, with white felt hats decorated with blue ribbon in modern esthetic style.

While the procession moved along the street and round the Palace, a figure of a whale on one of the floats was spouting water very naturally, but less true to nature was a voice from within the monster, calling out in very good English, "See her blow!"

Two bands of warriors descended from their perches and ranged themselves face to face in front of the Palace main entrance. They went through various evolutions with their long spears, concluding with a lively but brief sham battle. The respective leaders, representing Kamehameha I. and Kahekehi, a contemporary King of Kauai, made orations before His Majesty, which must have been comical from the merriment they caused among those who understood Hawaiian. The King, smiling benignly on the personators of his renowned predecessors, made a brief and gracious reply to their addresses. After going round the Palace three times, the procession moved off the grounds and dispersed.

The King, in a white suit loaded with leis, sat on the front verandah, accompanied by Princesses Liliuokalani, Likelike and Kaiulani, their Excellencies Gibson, Kanoa, Aholo and Rosa, Hon. A. S. Cleghorn and others. At the right the space was occupied by the female members of the royal secret organization known as the "Ball of Twine Society," attired in light holo cloth adorned with the regalia of the order. Male members were also conspicuous on the veranda and grounds.

SUPREME COURT.

The Madras Case.

In chambers on Saturday before Judge McCully, the Court heard a motion by plaintiffs in the case of John Chapman and others vs. the Hawaiian Government, for the issuance of a commission to take the deposition of a witness in a foreign country. This action is better known as the steamship Madras damage case, which is on for trial at the next January term of the Supreme Court. It was ordered that the clerk of the Court issue a commission to Herbert Garrett Janion, of Manchester, England, to take the deposition of John Chapman of the same place. This makes the second commission issued to the same gentleman, and is issued on account of some defect in the answers to the first interrogations propounded. Commission issued accordingly, to be sent by the first outgoing mail. Hon. S. B. Dole for plaintiff, Wm. A. Whiting for the Hawaiian Government.

A MORTGAGE CASE.

John D. Spreckels and Brothers vs. George W. Macfarlane. This is a cause filed before Chief Justice Judd in the clerk's office on Saturday at 2 o'clock p. m., and is a bill in equity praying for foreclosure of a mortgage and interest, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $47,377.77. As usual in such cases an injunction was issued enjoining the defendant from disposing of the property enumerated in the plaintiffs' mortgage until the further order of Court. The Court appointed Tuesday the 7th day of December next as the return day and endorsed its allowance to the issuance of the usual writs. At 12 minutes before three the Marshal in person served upon the defendant copies of the complaint, summons and injunction. Messrs. F. M. Hatch and John T. Dare appeared for plaintiffs.

The Anglo-Australian Mail.

A Wellington despatch to the Auckland Herald says: Commencing with the despatch of the next month's San Francisco mail, the steamer will leave Auckland a day earlier than now—on Monday instead of Tuesday. Correspondingly, mails will also close a day sooner than present date at all other places. The change will enable homeward mails being forwarded from New York by the Saturday fast boat for Queenstown, and delivered in London three or four days earlier than is now the case.

FIRE ON NUUANU AVENUE.

Last evening shortly after six o'clock a house just beyond the first bridge, Nuuanu avenue, owned by Mr. James Campbell, and occupied by Mr. Hugh McMillan, engineer at the Honolulu Iron Works, was discovered to be on fire. Mr. and Mrs. McMillan went out at six o'clock, leaving a lamp burning in one of the back rooms, and it is supposed that the lamp exploded. This theory is supported by the fact that the first intimation of the fire was given by a native rushing out from premises adjacent, shouting, "Kukul" (lamp.) A policeman blew his whistle vigorously by way of alarm, which brought Mr. C. B. Reynolds, officer of the Board of Health, and other neighbors to the spot. They worked hard with utensils and a garden hose to subdue the flames, which had spread all over the bedroom and dining room into which the rear of the cottage is divided. The pressure of water was not strong enough to send the stream to the ceiling, so that although the fire that was in sight was put out the flames got into the attic. Mr. Thomas Spence, who went out to telephone that there was no necessity for an alarm being sounded, on coming back saw fire coming through the roof and hurried back to renew the call for an alarm. In the meantime those who had collected began getting out the furniture and most of it was soon piled up in the garden.

An alarm was first rung from the bell of Engine Company No. 4, Nuuanu street, quickly followed by the loud tones of the Tower bell. The Volunteer Boys from the Bell Tower with their hose reel were the first of the brigade to reach the spot. They put on a stream from the hydrant close by, giving way to Engine No. 4 that quickly arrived with steam up. Engine No. 2 was not far behind and attached to the hydrant at the corner of Nuuanu avenue and School street. The Hook and Ladder Company were early on the spot with their indispensable gear. Company No. 1 did not take their engine out, but their members were on hand in good force, together with those of China Company. The house was deluged with several heavy streams, pressure having been applied, but not till holes were cut in the roof was the last vestige of fire extinguished. Chief Engineer Wilson directed operations.

Mr. McMillan heard the clamor of fire from a house on Fort street, where he and his wife were visiting, and coming out saw the reflection but did not know it was his cottage till he got near the place. Besides the destruction of the bedroom furniture, there was doubtless a good deal of damage done in removing the rest. The house is damaged several hundred dollars' worth, insurance unknown at this writing. There is a policy of $1,400 on the furniture. The latter was of a valuable class, including some expensive pictures, but in the confused heap lying in the mud and rain it was impossible last night to estimate the amount of injury sustained.

Rough Weather at Kahului.

During the heavy weather of the 16th, at Kahului, our correspondent at that port writes, the schooner J. B. Leeds parted her mooring chains, and tore her stern bits out, but succeeded in getting out a cable before drifting on to the reef.

A boat from the J. B. Leeds capsized on the same day, and the crew of three men were rescued from their perilous position by Pilot English and crew, who also put to sea and recovered the boat after landing the crew in safety.
